MY BOWLING.

After Mr. Vincent had taken the lead in the criminal investigation department of the English police chief quarters he called me into his office.

"Jarnold," said he, do you happen to know this place at all," handing me a slip of newspaper.

It was an auctioneer's advertisement. "An old-fashioned family residence, commanding extensive views," etc.

"Oh, yes, sir. I have lived in Nottingham," I answered. "That's one of the haunted houses in that neighborhood. My landlady could have talked a year about it. It closes remains of a very old building."

"Very good. In fact, Van Tornow and Prettypage both said you knew those parts. Well, the family, intimate friends of ours, cannot sell the property, and as the little peculiarities of the ghosts you have been told about verge on larceny, I think you may as well combine your August outing with a stroke of business that way."

"Very well, sir."

That was enough for me. I ran down by the night train and went over in the morning to the cottage in Sherwood forest, where I had formerly lodged. At the first mention of Gunthorpe Manor, Mrs. Wingood chattered as volubly as ever. The ghost had not been laid by the demolition of the bulk of the antique structure, but perambulated the new house and grounds. Vexed at its old haunts being annulled it revenged itself by tormenting the guests, and had taken away articles of jewelry from several sleeping rooms, not even sparing the Countess Massarene, who had been given the grand old bedroom where James I. had been welcomed.

I went back to the town and saw the family solicitor. The articles lost by visitors up to the latest and most important disappearance of Lady Massarene's casket had not been seen by pawnbrokers. The police told me that they had not come upon them. I could answer for London's and Van Tornow had investigated Holland and Hamburg.

I remarked to the lawyer "that the thefts have been perpetrated by some one who does not need money or who is unable to dispose of his plunder from being green to the job."

With a letter from Mr. Waschager to Mr. Gunthorpe to blind the servants to my true position, I drove over to the house.

It was very large since the thick walls of the castle had been preserved, though the tower and ramparts had been destroyed. I doubt not that the Sherwood forest robbers had held it even against forces from the town and Nottingham castle. The latter commanded it with modern artillery, but in its days of glory

It was not in the woods that we were to undertake the butler and a young woman who had begun by helping him to reduce the larger stock, and then took care of the property which he stole from the guests. They had managed it neatly. When she was afraid to tackle the guest in the Robin Hood rooms she would open the door to let him in; or if he had robbed the tenant of another chamber, she likewise opened the way for his passing the goods to her in her receptacle. For caution's sake she dwelt there as long as possible without change. Luckily for the owners, the precious pair had intended to elope with their spoil when complete, and nearly all the valuables were recovered, and quite a show they made in the
